*in the sense of either, or at least [aut in omni, aut in magna parte vitæ, C. Tusc. 3, 17, 28]. Aut—aut may stand in interrogatives and comparative sentences, and may follow negatives. (2) Vel—vel. In aut—aut the members necessarily exclude each other; in vel—vel they only exclude each other arbitrarily, according to the view of the speaker, and it is not implied that they might not possibly co-exist. Vel—vel sometimes approaches to the meaning of sive—sive; i. e. the speaker conceives the things as different indeed, but not essentially, so that it is immaterial which is taken: pace vel Quirini vel Romuli dixerim. The second vel may be strengthened by etiam, vero etiam, or omnino. (3) Sive—sive is the 'either—or' of indifference, the speaker leaving it undecided, from ignorance or any other motive, which name, supposition, &c., is the correct one; e. g. sive casu, sive consilio; sive felicitate quadam, sive bonitate nature, &c. In the best prose, vel in C. sive—sive is used; with the exception, however, of Cæsar, who has often seu—seu. In post-Aug. writers we have also sive—seu, or seu—sive. The second sive may be strengthened by etiam.—(4) After negatives, the usual way of translating 'either—or' is by (neque)—neque; e. g. nemo unquam neque poeta neque orator fuit; nihil loci est neque æternitatis neque sociorum [see end of Obs. 1, on aut]. Not either—or, neque (nec)—neque (nec). E.—or even, aut—aut etiam, aut—aut vero (the second being the stronger supposition).—vel—vel etiam; vel etiam vero; vel omni no—~~est~~ The aut or vel may be repeated three or more times. Nor did he wish to derive the state of e. army, neque rempublicam alterutro exercitu privare voluit: if any one had not been of e. side, si qui non alterutrusque partis fui-set: take or choose e., utrumlibet elige or utrum horum mavis accipere: in e. way the consequence will be a great confusion, utroqueque modo summa sequetur confusio (Q. 3, 6, 29). I have less strength than e. of you, minus habeo virum, quam utervis vestrum: let e. abuse the other, uterque utrumque vituperato. Not—either, neuter; on either (= each) side, alterutrumque (Plin. 20, 26).

It, however, sometimes stands like umquam, in the second member of a comparative sentence, magis opportuna opéra nonnumquam, quam aliquando fidelis: it may also stand with ullus: querere—ea num vel e Philone vel ex illo Academico audivisset aliquando, C. Acad. 4, 4, 11).—æquando (in indignant questions, to express emotion, &c., equando te rationem factorum tuorum redditurum putasti? equando tu...vidisti? equando...isto fructu...quiquam caruit?). So ubiquecumque, &c.). (Obs. The proper Engl. idiom in such phrases as, 'to ask never a much,' 'to charm never so wisely,' &c., is neglected by many modern writers, who use 'ever' for ignorance. See Webster's Dict. With e. [never] so great an army, EVERY, quisque, quæque, quidque, and (used adjectively) quodque (every one that belongs to a certain number or whole: one as well as the other; hence 'all', but considered individually). — quivis. quilibet, with the two neut. forms quid and quodvis; quidvis and quodlibet; the quid- forms used substantively; the masc. and fem. have but one form (e. one = 'any one you please'; but quivis is subjective, referring the choice to the person addressed; quilibet, objective, referring it to chance: any one that turns up, no matter which). — omnes, pl. (all); including therefore every individual composing the whole, but not considering them individually, but inclusively). — omnis (in sing. is also used for 'e.' with a singular substantive; it denotes that the substantive is to be taken as a whole, as the name of a class, so that what is said of it holds good of all the class; e. g. omnis de officio quæstio duplex est; this is true of every kind of discussion about points of morality; so omni officio satisfacere cū, i. e. by services of every kind). — Every single (one), unus quisque; unus quivis; unus quilibet, or quilibet unus (this addition of the unus strengthens the individualizing power of the pronouns; the distinctions, of course, remain the same). — Let e. man retain whatever he possesses, quod cuique obtingit, id quisque teneat. In the days of our ancestors the experienced were employed for this service, but now e. body, no matter who, apud majores adhibebatur peritus, nunc quilibet. E. body loves himself, se quisque diligit. Pompey feared e. thing, that you might not fear alth, timebat Pompeius omnia, ne aliquid vos timeretis. E. man of them (e. g. was killed), ad unum omnes, omnes ad unum. ¶ Sometimes 'every' is translated by nullus non, nemo non, as a more emphatic exclusion of all exceptions, and sometimes by quicumque ('any one whichever it be', Agesilaus non destitit, quibuscumque rebus posset, patriam juvare). Before e. thing, omnium primum; ante omnia. ¶ When 'every' refers to any numerical distribution, the distributive numerals are to be used; e. g. binæ venationes per dies quinque, i. e. two e. day for five days; so for e. day, month, year, singulis diebus, mensibus, annis, &c. FIRMAMENTAL, cœlestis.

FIRMLY, || FIRM. firme.—firmiter.—solida.—|| With constancy, stabili et firmo animo.—constanter (e. g. dolorem ferre).—æquo animo (e. g. dolorem ferre).—firme (stiffly; e. g. firmissime asseverare). I am f. convinced, persuasissimum mihi est: to be f. convinced of altho, sibi persuasus de re: to meet death f., fidenti animo ad mortem pergere; prompte necem subire (of a violent death; see T. Ann. 16, 10, 1); irrevocabili constantia ad mortem decurrere (of a suicide; Plin. Ep. 3, 7, init.).

FIRMNESS, firmitas (as visible quality, e. g. of a body, &c.; then impropr. of character, that makes it apt to resist temptation).—firmitudo (as an innate and abiding quality; then impropr. of mental f.; e. g. firmitudo gravitatis animi).—soliditas (solidity, durability, e. g. of a wall).—stabilitas (stability, of whatever stands fast and firm).—animi firmitudo (C., Cæsar., T.); animi fortitudo, animus certus or confirmatus (resoluteness, mental f.).—constantia (impropr.; consistency in one's conduct, constancy).—perseverantia (impropr.: the f. displayed by him who does not allow himself to be deterred from his resolutions). A noble f., libera contumacia (i. e. noble defiance; C. Tusc. 1, 29, 71): to show a noble f., liberam cont. adhibere (ibid.) an inflexible f., irrevocabili constantia (Plin. Ep. 3, 7, 2): to proceed in altho with f., constantiam adhibere et ut: to display great f. in algh, fortissimum esse in re (e.g. in causâ suspectâ, of an advocate): you must retain your f., or show your f., retinenda est vobis constantia: with f.: see FIRMLY.

FIRST, adj. primus (so far as, in space or time, he makes his appearance f., and others follow him).—principes (so far as he acts f., and others follow his example).—summus. maximus. præcipuus (sup post-Aug., principalis; except in f. causes, cause principales; opp. secondary causes).—primarius (f. in rank, dignity, or value). The f. men in the state: see 'CHIEF men.' The f. point, caput ca rei. summus ca rei. cardo ca rei (on which all turns; V. and Q.).—momentum (pow), the critical, decisive point. It was ever his f. ca, e, semper maxima or antiquissima cura fuit: to make algh one's f. object, omne studium in qâ re ponere. This is the f. point, hoc caput est; hoc maximum or primum est. To fall in love at f. sight, devenire or incidere in amorem uno aspectu (duet, ad Her. 2, 20, 33). Nobody can fall in love at f. sight, nemo potest uno aspectu neque præteritis in amore devenire (ib.). For 'in the first place,' see FIRST, adv.—sup The three f. tres primi (e.g. tribus primis diebus, Ca. B. C. 1, 18, wh may help to banish the foolish notion that accuracy requires us to say 'the first three'). He considered that the f. thing was, &c., nihil prius faciendum putavit. sup The Latins regarded as an apposition the closer definition, wh in English is expressed by a rel. proposition, or by an inf.—I was the f. who did it, or the f. to do it, primus feci. If only two are spoken of, the f. is prior, opp. to the second, posterior; or, if there be a ref. to two subjects already named, like (the second being expressed by hic). If f. = earliest, ultimus is used; ab ultimâ origine: the f. (= next) afy, proximus. If the f. thing, = the most important thing, summum or caput is used; e.g. the f. step towards a happy life is, caput est ad bene vivendum: he considered that the f. thing should be, nihil prius faciendum putavit. To be the f. in algh, initium ca rei facere, capere, ducere (to do it, to make a beginning); principem esse in re; optimum, præstantissimum esse in qâ genere; ca rei principatum obtinere (to be the most excellent); let us be neither f. nor last, nec duces sumus, nec agmen claudamus: each wishing to be the f. (on the road), quum sibi quisque primum itineris locum peteret: to be the f. of his class, classem ducere (Q. 1, 2, 28). to be the f. afy, the king, secundum imperii gradum tenere: I am the f. (to get up) in the morning, and the last at night (in going to bed), primus cubitu surgo, postremum cubitum eo.

FIRST, adv. 1. At first, primo (the general distinction between primo and primum is, that primo relates to time, primum to the order of occurrence: so that primo = 'at first,' implying that a change took place afterwards, primum = 'first,' when followed by wh some time afterwards, in the second, third, last place, &c. Though this distinction is not universal, it should be observed by Lat. writers with this exception, according to Zumpt and Hand. vol. iv. p. 558 [agst Haase], that when deinde or postea follows, C. usually places primum for 'at first.'—sup principio (at the beginning, originally; jus augurum divinationis opinione principio constitutum est; postea Ca. C..)—sup initio (at the outset; redeo ad illud quod initio scripsi).—sup primo may be followed by post, postea, deinde, inde, dehinc, tum, postremo, ad extremum, tandem, mox, nunc, jam (Hand iv. p. 558; Curt. h primus = d jam). 2. Before all others, primus (adj. the f., afy postremo).—prior (adj. the f. foremost of two, opp. posterior).—in prima (before all others, &c.). It would be incorrect, in this sense, to say primo: he must get up f., and go to bed last, primus cubitu surgit, postremum cubitum eat: whichever party f. occupied this pass, would have no trouble in keeping off the enemy, qui prior has angustias occupaverit, ab hoc hostem prohiberi nihil esse negotii: he f., or f. of all, sup Adherbat to death, then the rest, in prima Adherbat necat, dein omnes.

(but only in cases in which contra or adversus would express the contrary notion; the primary notion of 'for' or 'in a thing's place' being always prominent).—secundum with acc. (in accordance with, but never expressing, like ex, causality).—in usum or gratiam cs (in favour of a thing, for a thing's advantage, use, &c.). To vote for a thing, e. g. at an election, &c.), suffragio suo ornare qm; suffragio suo adjuvare qm in petendis honoribus; suffragari ci ad munus (see Plin. Ep. 2, 1, 8; 8, 23, 2; C. et qd: we are not preparing ourselves for the school, but for life, non scholae, sed vitae discimus: for the public or general welfare, omnium salutis causa. || Towards, in, adversus (both with acc., in a friendly as well as a hostile sense).—erga (in a friendly sense only; e. g. love for ab, amor in or erga qm). In many instances, however, an oblique case is sufficient to express 'for'; e. g. a remedy for fear, remedium timoris (or timori); love for ab, amor cs; care for you, vestri cura: an oblique case must not, however, be used unless where it is quite free from ambiguity: an oblique case (only the dative) will also suffice aff. certain adjectives; e. g. after 'fit', 'convenient', &c.; but also the gen. is its usual instead; e. g. anxious for ab, studiosus cs rei. So after 'it is becoming' or 'unbecoming' for ab, decet or dedecet qm. || In proportion, according to, pro (differing both from secundum, which denotes accordance, and pro ex, which implies causality): for my part, pro mea parte (i. e. according to the measure of my strength; see equidem has been generally explained 'I for my part'; but Hand shows that this force does not belong to it, but that of an affirmative particle, the affirmation referring to the speaker. Since, however, 'I for my part' is often little more than this, affirming that the speaker will do so and so, whether others do or not, 'I for my part' is often sufficiently translated by equidem): every one for himself, pro sua quique parte: for so great a victory there was but little bloodshed, minor clades quam pro tantâ victoriâ fuit: they are very few for the number of the well-disposed, pro multitudine bene sentientium admodum pauci: they thought that, for their numbers and their military glory, their territory was too confined, pro multitudine hominum et pro gloria bellâ angustos se fines habere arbitrabantur (Cæs.). Another Crcl. by which this proportional 'for' is translated is with ut, where 'case' or 'expectant' potest: must be supplied; e. g. he was learned for those times, erat, ut temporibus illis (sc. esse potest) eruditus. So; a rich man for those times, ut tum erat tempora, dives: an eloquent man for a Theban, satis exercitatus in dicendo, ut Thebanus scilicet (Np). || Denoting purpose, its by the gerundive, or by the gerund in the gen. with 'causa' or by the acc. with ad; e. g. Antigonus delivered up the corpse of Eumenis to his friends for interment, Antigonus Eumenem mortuum propinquis ejus sepeliendum tradidit: for the purpose of foraging, pabulandi causâ (e. g. tres legiones mittere): for the purpose of laying Celtiberia waste, ad depopulandam Celtiberiam. By later writers the participle fut. act. is used in similar cases after verbs denoting or implying motion. To do althg f. the purpose of &c., facere qd eo consilio, ut &c. 'For' may also be translated by the supine: for the purpose of imploring, &c., (veniunt) rogatum, &c.; and by ut or qui with &c. || Denoting duration of time; e. g. for ten days, per decem dies. It is often a sign of the dative. It is impossible for me, hoc facere, emere non possum: it is impossible for me to &c., fieri non potest, ut &c., or neque with infinit; e. g. it is impossible for a king to live like a private person, necesse est vivere privatus: for instance, or example, verbi or exempli causâ or gratiâ; stave! FOR, conj. (alleging a reason or cause), nam. namque enim. etenim (with this difference, that 'nam' introduces the subsequent sentence, as explicative of the preceding one; the statement contained in the latter being defined by certain reasons alleged. The sentence joined by 'nam' appears only as an appendix, as it were, to the preceding one; hence 'namque': both, as a general rule, stand at the beginning of the sentence: 'enim' is used if the subsequent sentence is necessary to render the preceding one intelligible, or establish the proof of whatever has been advanced in it: in this latter case the reason alleged is as important as the assertion itself: the copulative 'et' is used to show the connexion; and hence 'etenim,' which precedes the sentence for the purpose of giving prominence to the reason contained in it; whereas 'enim,' if standing by itself, is always inserted somewhere into the sentence; comp. Zumpt, §345).—[For etenim and enim both sometimes assert what the speaker wishes to be taken for granted; etenim is also used in explanatory parentheses, and in questions, in which enim is also used; but etenim (= et quum ita sit, quum) makes the connection more distinct; Pr. Intr. II. 791). For—not, neque enim (but non enim is not so uncommon in C. as is supposed; Pr. Intr. II. 789): for since, etenim, quoniam: for if, etenim si (ib. 791): for—never, neque unquam. For nothing is, nihil est enim (ib. 791) in a sentence with est beginning with the predicate, or non, num, nemo, nihil, quis, or if est is emphatic, est mihi likes the second, enim the third place; Pr. Intr. II. 112).—[Beca use, quum. quia. quod. quoniam. quandoquidem (implying also a reason, with this difference, that 'quum' alleges a simple reason merely, our 'since'; 'quia' and 'quod,' of which the former is the stronger, allege a reason founded on necessity, our 'because'; 'quoniam' alleges a reason deduced from the accidental occurrence of circumstances, our 'whereas'; 'quandoquidem' gives a reason inferred from some preceding circumstance).—[quidem (= 'since it is admitted,' implies something known and granted; see Zumpt, §346).—[See BECAUSE, especially on the manner of translating 'for'—[because' by the relat. The preposition 'from' is not expressed before the names of a town or small island, but the abl. is used to express the relation: a preposition however becomes necessary, if a place is to be pointed out more distinctly or minutely; or if only a part of a town or its neighbourhood are spoken of [e. g. Libo discessit a Brundisio = fm the harbour of Brundisium; Cæs. B. C. 3, 24]; in a similar manner, if that preposition has a stress upon it, and stands in contradistinction [usque a Dianio ad Sinopen navigarunt, C. Verr. 2, 1, 34; erat a Gergoviā despectus in castra, Cæs. Ab Athenis proficisci in animo habebam, C. Pom. 4, 12, 2]; likewise, if an appellative, as urbs, oppidum, locus, stands in opposition to the name of the town (as, ex oppido Gergoviā, Cæs.; ex Apolloniā, Ponti urbe, Plin.); with domus the preposition is used, when dom. does not mean 'home' as usual residence; but = 'house' as building, or 'family'. So ur = 'country', is without the preposition, but takes it when a particular 'estate' is meant. Sis, however, the acc. is used; to desert f. aby, qm deserere (also a quo defecere, or desciessere).—~~From~~

I made you f. my slave a freed man, e servo te libertum feci; so nihil est tam miserabile, quam ex beato miser. — d) 'From', when it follows a subst., is often expressed by the objective genitive; as, death is a rest fm all labours and troubles, mors laborum ac miseriarum quies est. — e) To denote a person's residence, or the place of his birth, &c., an adj. is only used; e. g. Milo f. Croton, Milo Crotoniates; but sic, apud by L., a is used; e. g. Turnus ab Aricia [L. 1, 50, 3] = Turnus Ariciensis. — f) F. his very boyhood, jam inde a puero (~~From~~ not inde a puero without jam). — g) After 'different' f. is translated by ac, atque. (= to have that task, &c.), by partec. in dus: I have got many letters to write, multas mihi epistolas scribendæ sunt. — I To have got! [= to have] a book, &c., is objected to by Webster and other writers as a vulgarism; but it is not only thoroughly idiomatical, but may be easily justified. 'To get' being 'to acquire' (recipere, obtinere, &c.): 'to have got' = 'to have acquired' (recipere, obtinere), and so 'to have,' 'to possess'; and it so happens that the latter word has the same peculiarity in Greek, κτ-δωαι. 'I got' [where the radicals κτ- correspond to gt, the smooth mute κ having passed, according to Grimm's law, into the middle mute g]; κτ-δωαι, 'I have got' = 'I have' or 'possess.' Webster also objects to 'I could not get him to do this' [Addison], and 'I could not get the work done,' as not elegant. It is to be hoped that the time for sacrificing our old idioms to modern and sickly notions of elegance is pretty nearly gone by. — For other combinations, e. g. to get aby's CONSENT, &c., see the substs.*

HAVE, 1) To possess (in a wide sense), habere qd (to be in actual possession of a property, whether material or intellectual, outward or inward; e. g. auctoritatem, potentiam. See below on tenere).—est mihi qd (i. e. pot. vi, for wch if the subject be of the p-ssession of any mental quality, we may say, sum qd re or cor rei, but only when the property has an attributive (adjective) to possess; see examples in Possess).—qd possides (to possess; also a mental property, &c., ingenium, magnum vim, &c.).—tenere (to continue within itself physically; e. g. to h. so many countries, districts [ = continere]; then also of rulers, generals, or other possessors; ten. qm locum: to h. the supreme command, ten. summam imperii. Also = 'I have you,' i. e. h. caught you tripping; see end of article).—qd re praedit, instrum. or ornatum esse (to be endowed, furnished with althg; the latter imply with an agreeable and honorable thing).—inesse ei or in qo. esse in qo (to dwell in obj. as a property; inesse, with dat. in hiolarians; S. Cat. 58, 2, &c.; Np. Ep. 5, 2; with in ant. ubi., T. r. Eun. 1, 1, 14; C. Off. 1, 37, 134, &c.).—affectum esse qd re (to be affected with althg, imply with an emt; to be in a certain state or condition).—uti qo or qd re (to h. a person who is employed, or thing that is used, to enjoy the use of althg, can be used only when 'to have' has these meanings; hence it is u. i. Lat. to say, 'he had a barber for his father,' patre usus est tonsore [= he employed his father as his barber] for natus est patre tonsore or patrem habebat tonsorem; non parit uisus est insula N. N. for patrem habebat insula N. N.—ignotis iudicibus quam notis uti malle (to prefer having judges who were strangers to him, &c.). it is right, he having an object in this; i. e. that of escaping through their ignorance of his character.—he had a frugal man for his father, usus est patre diligenti; see examples with uti below).—valere qd re (to be strong by means of althg, or in althg, e. g. naval power, popularity, &c.).—penes qm est qd (althg is lodged with, or put in the hands of obj.; e. g. T. Quinctius had the command, summa imperii pnes T. Quinctium erat). To h. money, troops, ornatum esse pecuniā, copias: to h. great wealth, divitiis or opibus et copis affluere: to h. children, liberis auctum esse: to h. a great many children, beatissimum esse liberis: to h. children by a woman, liberos ex qd (not ab qd) antulasse or suscipisse: to h. a woman for one's wife, habere qm in matrimonio: to h. obj for one's husband, nuptum esse ei: to h. obj for or as a friend, habere qm amicum; uti qo amico: to h. a most intimate friend in obj, uti qo familiariter or intime (to h. intimate intercourse with obj): to h. obj for an enemy, infestus est mihi qd: to h. a good (true) friend in obj, habere qm bonum amicum: to h. a st-ut friend or enemy in obj, fortem amicum or inimicum expertum esse qm (both Np. Them. 9, 4): to h. equal rights (with obj), eodem jure or il-dem legibus uti: to h. a favorable wind, success in war, uti ventis secundis, uti proclive secundis: those whom I had with me, qui erant mecum (g. i. as companions); quon habebam mihi ad manum (as helpers, for support); I had few (attendants) with me, pauci erant me erant: to h. persons with me, homines circum pedes habere: to a person always about one, qm sibi amicum habere: to a. obj for colleague, part. &c., qo socius mihi adjunctus esse: to h. a person or persons, ei subjunctum or subjectum esse: to a. obj under one, ei praesese or praepositum esse: to h. the enemy before one, e regione hostis (hostium) esse or stare: to long to h. nithg, egere qd re: to h. a disease, morbo corruptum esse: bnt, to h. a fever, febrem or febrim or (dim.) febriculum habere (C.): to h. no fever, febrim non habere; febrim carere: a febre liberari (if the person has had it). *To have, with subtt., imply with abstract subtt., is often expressed in Lat. by a who containing the notion of such subtt.; as, to h. plausura or delight in althg, gaudere or delectari qd re: to h. leisure for althg, vacare ei r: i (see the particular subtt. with which 'have' is used). Not to h., carere qd re: to h. enough, nihil ultra flagitare: no longer to h. a parent, parentibus orbem or orbatum or privatum esse: he has enough to live upon, habet qui or unde utatur: althg has something in it, non temere fit; est qd in re momenti; ei rei subest qd (e. g. a report has something in it).

Hence, 'to have,' in a wider acceptance, a) e. g., to h. received: now you h. my plans, habes consilia nostra: you h. it now, hem tibi i you h. this for your time-serving, hunc fructum refers ex isto tuo utriusque partis studio. b) To have heard, to know; e. g., to h. althg on good authority, qd certo auctore or certis auctoribus cognovisse: I h. the information from your brother, hoc accipi a fratre tuo; hoc audivi de fratre tuo. c) To get, to take, to receive, accipere (of what you desire or order): there you h. the book, accipe librum (as H. Sat. 1, 4, 14, accipe tabulas: here you h. two hundred quires (of paper), tu vero aufer ducentos scapcos (C. Att. 5, 4, 4): there! you h. it! utere, accipe! (as Plaut. Mil. 3, 1, 176): new bread may always be had here, semper hic recentis panis est copia: that can easily be had, parabilia. d) to wish or desire to h., i. e. to demand, request, order, wish, &c.; e. g. what would you h.? quid vis? quid postulā? what would you h. with me? quid est, quod me vells? I would h. you do so and so, tu velim facias &c.

2) To hold in the hand, to carry or wear on oneself, habere, tenere (to hold), gestare (to carry, bear, wear): to h. in one's hands, (in) manibus habere or tenere: to h. in the hand (to lend), manu ducere: to h. about, secum habere or portare or gestare; esse cum qd re (e. g. cum teio): to h. something perpetually in one's mouth: to be continually mentioning it, qd semper in ore habere.

3) In connexion with the infin., in various relations. a) The infin. aft. 'I have,' is often equivalent to a relative clause; e. g., 'I have nothing to accuse old age of,' = 'I have nothing, of wch I may accuse old age,' nihil (or non) habeo, quod incusam senectutem; nihil habeo, quod ad te scribam: I h. nothing to write, non habeo, quod scribam (but in non habeo, quid scribam, habeo would = scio, cognitum or perceptum habeo, I do not know what to write; see Beter. C. Off. 2, 2, 7; Krüger, 615, Obs. 6): this is what I had to say, hanc habui, quae dicerem (not hanc habui dicere, wch is a Grecism): he has nothing to accuse us of, non est, cur nos incuset. b) The infin. aft. 'to have,' is its equivalent to an expression of duty, or rather denotes a task. Here it must be rendered by the partic. of the future passive; as, every one has to employ his own judgement, suo cuiusque iudicio utentium est: I h. many letters to write, multae litterae mihi scribendae sunt. In this construction, in the consequence of a conditional proposition, 'I would have,' &c. fuit is more common than fuisset; e. g. if you had lived, you would h. had to undergo althg, si vixisses, qd tibi subeundum fuit. | To have a thing done, = to get it done, is to be translated by curare, with partic. in dus. I had him honorably buried, funus ei satis amplum faciendum curavi. But a person is, as in English, oft. said to do what he really gets done for him: I will h. you put to death, interdicam, uti vobis in a ring made, quam vellet annulum sibi facere. | Have = have caught (collog.): I h. you (there) teneo te! or hic te teneo! (collog.): e. g. teneo te, inquam, nam &c. C. Acad. 2, 48, 148; hic te, inquit, teneo; non est istud iudicium pui; C. Quinct. 10, 63). | In answers, 'I have' is really equivalent to the perfect def. of the verb asking the question: 'thus have you conquered?' 'I have' = 'I have conquered,' vici. If the question is 'have you got it?' = 'do you possess it?' the answer will be in the present: 'A, you got it?' teneat? I A., teneo.

HE, is implied in Lat. by the form of the verb, and in most cases sufficiently so. But if a particular emphasis is to be laid on it, it is usual to employ the demonstrative pronoun ille, or with ref. to a third party, i-to; and if he is = he himself, the master, &c., it is rendered by ipse (see Ruhnk. Ter. And. 2, 2, 23); e. g. they say that the Pythagoreans used to answer, 'he hath said it,' Pythagoreos ferunt respondere solitos, ipse dixit. The pronoun is also expressed when two actions of the same person are contrasted. It is used (1) if a person spoken of by name before (e. g. Polemarchus est Murgentinus, vir bonus atque honestus. Is quum

&c.); and (2) as the simple unemphatic antecedent to qui; he who, is qui (often, qui only: and in general propositions, si quis). || What has been just said, refers only to 'he' in the nominative; for the other cases a demonstrative pronoun must be used, except where it is sufficiently implied by the context. — Also for 'he,' 'him,' &c., when = 'a person,' the Latin us homo; as, do you know him? nosti hominem? I love him very much, valde hominem diligo. In the acc. with infn. 'he' must be translated by se ('that' being omitted). In oblique narration (to which the construction of acc. with infn. belongs, when the principal verb and the infn. have the same subject), 'him,' &c., is translated by sui, sibi, se, when the person so designated is the nom. of the principal sentence; by ipse for the nom., and where the use of the reflexive would occasion an ambiguity; e. g. putat hoc sibi nocere: Gajus contemnebat divitias, quod se felicem reddere non possent. || She there are also persons spoken of, and others spoken to. These must be denoted by is, hic, ille. Legationi Ariovistus respondit; si quid ipsi a Cæsare opus esset, sese ad eum venturum fuisse; si quid ille se velit, illum ad se venire oportere (here the speaker, Ariovistus, uses ipse and sui of himself; and having first named Cæsar, the person spoken of, he afterwards designates him by is and ille). So, too, if he had spoken to Cæsar, the direct, si quid mihi a te opus esset, would become si quid sibi (or ipsi) a Cæsare (or ab eo) illo opus esset, &c. But even of the speaker himself, the demonstr. 'is' is still found; Socrates respondit, sese muerisse . . . ut ei victus quotidianus in Prytaneo publice præberetur (C. Or. 1, 54). See HIS.
